

Kingdom Moments – Healing Hearts Deliverance

My greatest struggle revolved around the internal pressure to excel in my relationship with God. Subconsciously, I believed I had to be a flawless Christian to deserve His love. Whenever I fell short of the standards set by the Bible or the sermons I heard, I deemed myself lukewarm and unworthy of love. So, my primary challenge was this performance-driven mindset in my relationship with my Heavenly Father.

My parents were typically very supportive and loving. However, there were a few instances, starting when I was quite young, when they said things that were not as encouraging. I vividly recall one such incident when I was seven, shortly after accepting Christ into my heart. I was sitting in the living room, struggling with math while being homeschooled. My dad spent about an hour teaching me. He said, “Reyn, if you don’t learn this, you’ll still be sitting in this kindergarten seat when you’re 27.” Although I knew that didn’t make sense, I interpreted it literally, believing that if I didn’t perform well, I’d be stuck in life. My dad left the room, and right then, I began descending into a dark place that would affect me for years to come.

Despite being offered comfort, I found it challenging to accept because the walls were already rising due to my performance-driven relationships with both God and my parents, coupled with the shame that accompanied it. Receiving comfort at a young age became extremely difficult.

During my teenage years, I turned to the world for solace, and in my adult life, this evolved into self-destructive tendencies, all while I remained involved in ministry, sharing the message of Jesus.

It was the constant need to perform, coupled with an inability to accept comfort, a series of poor decisions, lingering shame, and an unending cycle. What I ultimately lacked was divine comfort. It is not that God wasn't offering it; I simply felt unable to measure up, a lie I came to believe.

It wasn't until I went through Healing Hearts that I experienced a significant breakthrough. The process allowed me to see the Holy Spirit highlighting major wounds that I didn’t know I had. I underwent life-changing deliverance and healing during my sessions. I would highly recommend Healing Hearts to anyone in need of a breakthrough. Just be sure to approach it with an open mind and a willingness to let the Lord minister to you in deeply personal ways!
